

Divided we fail. United we prevail . . .

This pathbreaking book tells how a new “transpartisan” politics works and why it is essential to solve challenges from public school and health policy reform to energy, the environment, and national security. For the 130 million registered independent and non-registered potential voters, the transpartisan agenda presents new ways of thinking that can bring the American people together at this crucial moment in our history.

“Listen to the media or our leaders and too often it will feel as if we are a deeply divided country. Yet we have vastly more in common than that which separates us. It is time for us to recognize our deep well of common interest and work together with respect and intelligence for our common good. Voice of the People speaks to this imperative. Read it and be part of the change.”

“Chickering and Turner want us to look at issues from a new perspective, develop new ways of talking about differences that may be more illusory than real, and come up with solutions that transcend the political and ideological divisions that so often prevent people of good-will from working together. Much of what they say is incredibly valuable; some of their conclusions will disturb readers on both sides of the ideological divide; and some may even seem naïve. But at least they’re trying to move us all to a better place. It’s a book worth reading, discussing, and pondering.”

“Required reading for anyone frustrated by divisive, do-nothing politics (and who isn’t?)... I couldn’t agree more with Chickering and Turner’s prescription: to generate truly popular – and thus sustainable – reforms, governments have to put “the public” back into the public debate. So, call me a “transpartisan.”
